You won't be alone. Attendance at church services suffers when the clocks are moved forward. I once tried to explain my absence by arguing it was my belief that God ran on standard time. I did not receive absolution.

Moving the clocks forward and backward can be very confusing.

Many people rely on the the old adage: Spring forward, fall backward. OK, but technically is it not possible to fall forward and spring backward?

Worse than failing to remember to move your clock is remembering to move your clock and then moving it in the wrong direction. This is more common than you might think.

I mean, who decided that the clocks should be changed at the exact same time (2 a.m.) that the bars close? I'm sure President Trump will fix this.

The time change is not just a one day thing, either. It can mess with the body's natural circadian rhythms for days.

Personally, I hate the word circadian. It reminds me of cicada, which is the name of the large bug fried in butter that I once ate for a newspaper story. Did it taste like chicken? I have no idea. It wasn't in my body long enough for me to tell.

Restaurant Review

A 'Pearl' of a restaurant at The Inn at Longshore

fter a great deal of anticipation, the newest restaurant to grace The Inn at Longshore in Westport, Pearl, has opened its doors. The restaurant's cosmopolitan appearance isn't what one might expect in a seaside community. There are coastal elements, of course. Repurposed bleached wood lines the wall behind the bar, which also houses a recycled glass countertop reminiscent of sea glass. The atmosphere perfectly reflects the personality of the town, sophisticated without being overly formal. Beyond the clean lines of the interior lies a magnificent view of Long Island Sound. If you're lucky enough to be there at sunset, be prepared to have your breath taken away. I spoke with chef Michael Hazen on a quiet Thursday afternoon. If his name rings a bell, the innovative chef launched the concept for the Bartaco restaurants. At Pearl he sets out to create a menu that is inspirational and reflective of today's lifestyle — clean and simple, with a modern approach. He offers food that is familiar, while pushing the envelope just slightly to offer an element of surprise. Hazen stressed the importance of offering items that are local and seasonal.

His commitment to the environment is unwavering. Hazen is in the process of fostering relationships with a local oyster farmer, and soon the restaurant will have its very own farm in the waters nearby. Additionally, Pearl will recycle its oyster shells to local reefs, serving to protect and enrich their natural habitats.

Hazen set a definite tone regarding the restaurant's culture. "It's got to be about the people," he told me, explaining his desire not only to embrace the diners, but those working at Pearl. "If we can make it about the people, it will be a win-win situation and people will embrace us.'

I decided to return on Friday evening to get a sense of what the restaurant was like in action. Although Hazen had described the atmosphere as low-key, the energy that evening was electric. There was an overwhelming sense of excitement in the air, and yet we were relaxed. The staff was exceptional — courteous and attentive.

As we settled in at the end of the bar, I decided it would be fun to sample some of the craft cocktails. Each one pays homage to the inn's historic past, with tributes to Marilyn Monroe, John D. Rockefeller and F. Scott Fitzgerald. We sampled the aforementioned, as well as the Stumble In. Made with house tequila infused with pineapple and jalapeno, triple sec, pineapple juice and lime, this offered the right amount of sweet to balance the spiciness of the jalapeno. This one might have been my

As we sipped our cocktails, we sampled the Montauk tuna, where thin slices of gently seared tuna took on the vibrant flavors of the avocado, thinly shaved radishes and olive oil, offering a nice twist on a perennial favorite.

But it was the Maine Lobster Lux that rendered us momentarily speechless. The menu describes it as lobster butter, chives, tarragon and brioche toast, but it is so much more. This lobster butter isn't what you might imagine, but the result of lobster, shrimp and other seasonings that have been infused for more than six hours to create a broth that is rich and intensely flavorful, in which you will find the perfectly cooked lobster meat.

Pork Chop (or Chicken) Milanese are popular choices and most I've tried haven't been anything to write home about, but Hazen knocks this one out of the ballpark. The pork was tender and juicy on the interior, while being perfectly crispy on the exterior. The shaved Brussels sprouts and gala apple slaw, along with whole grain mustard, offer up a complexity of flavors that perfectly complement each other.

How does one top an already near-perfect meal? With a spectacular Grand Oyster Tower consisting of six shrimp, four littlenecks, four cherrystones, eight oysters and half a chilled lobster. This alone could have been my dinner. Ordinarily, I pass on mignonette sauce, but decided to try a bit on an oyster. Suffice it to say this is like no other mignonette you've ever had before. The combination of two different types of rice vinegars, seasonings and fresh cilantro sets this version far apart from all the rest.

he drill is quiet and the sander is still this morning, as their operator makes her way to a custom-made piece of furniture in this large, airy industrial space in Bridge port's East Side. Marci Klein is like a proud parent as she talks about the desk, all  $23\frac{1}{2}$  by  $47\frac{1}{2}$ by 301/2 inches of innovative design and whimsical touches. Turns out, it's eco-friendly, too.

"The design took me over a year-and-a-half to perfect, but it opened a world of options,' says Klein, whose outfit reflects her constructive and creative spirit — blue jeans, work boots and an Austin City Limits T-shirt. "I wanted to create a blank canvas for creatives. The hard part was to design it to be simple, versatile and multifunctional.'

At its most basic, her furniture line begins with a patentpending framework, created bv custom-cut horizontal and vertical aluminum bars, held together by small interior screws. Add a top of sustainable bamboo, and then choose multicolored panels that slide along tracks, revealing as little or as much a view of the objects stowed behind them as their owner wants. Color choices abound for the frames and panels, as well as dropdown storage units that she calls "invisibins." The furniture pieces cost about $900 to more than $5,000.

"Once I got the design squared away and figured it out and tested everything and it worked, I decided I'm going to do this for real. This is the job for the next half of my life,"

These days, from her design studio at the Bridgeport Trade and Technology Center, Klein makes desks, credenzas, coffee tables, media and storage units out of those frames, tabletops and panels, that are, as she describes it, "modern, modifiable and modular," and all designed to work with multiple spaces and styles. Modify Furniture, which launched late last year, is all that, and more -asecond chapter for Klein, 46, whose toolbox once held a stethoscope. A pediatrician for about 20 years, she put her medical career on hold to go into furniture design and manufacturing nearly two years

As much an invention of her own imagination, her line also is inspired by the middentury modern movement, with its simple, clean, minimalistic design, as well as today's sensibilities: High-quality, costeffective products that rely on local resources, and sustainable materials and manufacturing.

"The whole idea of modern design was to make high-quality design available to everybody," says Ken Benson, a furniture designer for more than 40 years and adjunct professor at the Shintaro Akatsu School of Design at the University of Bridgeport. "It was meant to be relatively inexpensive, of high quality, efficient to make and made to last a long time."

What he sees as a societal shift — one that Klein has accounted for in her design is the desire for customization, meaning one can surround themselves with as little or as much individualized, visual complexity as they desire.

"I think today's modern design serves as a kind of palate for this, creating something different for yourself, which appeals to a broader audience. So someone like me might want clean, white panels, and perhaps a 20-year-old will want images of Marvel comics, and, in the end, they both will look great."

Klein suggests the panels (which can be custom created) are a great surface for your sweetheart's image, quite literally a swipe to the left or the right, which can be quickly switched out for your next sweetie, if things don't quite work out. Her impishness aside, Klein sees a serious opportunity to showcase local artists, wherever "local" happens to be.

She has launched a limited collection of works, "Modify After Dark." It already features work by Canadian painter Julie Hawkins, with whom she connected at the Toronto Interior Design Show in January where Klein's line made a splash. Brooklyn, N.Y., artist Kristin Reed's abstracts are on select coffee tables and Bridgeport street artist E.S. has given lots of color to a credenza. With nothing to lose, Klein then reached out to the wellknown Brooklyn-based furniture maker and woodworker Daniel Moyer to see if he would be willing to work with her. The result is what he calls the "executive decision" desk accessory, a playful paperweight made of material recyled from his other works. Klein has ideas for other collaborations to make her desks one-of-akind, open-sourced creations. She has created one of her own accessories, a milk and cookies tray, with a hollowed circle to rest a cup and a well to hold about six sandwich cookies. "It needed to be perfect."

This may seem like an odd detour, but Klein, who lives in Fairfield with her family, often tinkered alongside her civil engineering father, as he worked in his basement workshop in their Brooklyn home. Small spaces have long fascinated her, as well, in terms of how to maximize their potential. Before her days were steeped in sanding, drilling and hand-waxing for a living, she was thinking about furniture design — as is evident by the pair of futon-like couches that sit in a cozy corner in her design studio. "That was my Frank Lloyd Wright phase," she says with a self-deprecating laugh as she settles in one. She designed them more than 20 years ago, while living in a one-bedroom apartment in New York City and studying to be a doctor. She needed her furniture to do double-duty, serving as a couch and guest bed, yet look good while doing so. "That's all I could do at that time. I had to get someone else to make them."

Modify Furniture may be found at modifyfurniture.com or the Fairfield County Antique and Design Center in Norwalk.

Today's tartans are runway ready

By Christina Hennessy

What do Brooks Brothers, Saks Fifth Avenue, Florence, Italy, the Scottish Rugby Union team, Connecticut and the New York Tartan Day Parade have in common? The last one gives it away, by the way. If you said an official tartan, then you would be correct.

This material art, which has kept the Scottish people clothed and connected to their countryfolk and countryside for centuries, long ago extended past its borders, but it has increasingly become a way for disparate cultures and organizations around the world to rally behind a unified banner. As opposed to tartan's more humble beginnings — relatively simple designs created by ingredients at hand, such as lichen, tree bark, berries and seaweed — today's designs boast multiple vibrant colors and complicated patterns created by hand or with machines.

The designs also often come with a kind of legend, or a set of ideals, objects, history and geography that shape the thread count and ensuing pattern. Connecticut's, for instance, established in 1995, has blue and green stripes for Long Island Sound and its acres of forest; gray for its granite; red and yellow stripes for its foliage and white stripes for its snow.

"It's not as if time stood still with tartans," says Gregor MacIntyre, the pipe major for the Greenwich Pipe Band, which was started in 1982 by the late, Scottish-born John Beveridge, of Stamford. "New ones are being created every day.'

The Scottish Register of Tartans keeps track of the thousands around the world. MacIntyre, who emigrated from Scotland to the United States in 2000, is quite familiar with two of the more established designs. The modern Gordon tartan design colors the band's kilts, while the other is what he wears in solidarity with others who share his surname.

The former will literally be on parade when the band plays in the Connecticut adopted an official tartan in 1995, representing several components that represent the state, from the blue and green stripes for Long Island Sound and its acres of forest; gray for its granite; red and yellow stripes for its foliage; and white stripes for its snow.

"IT'S NOT AS IF TIME STOOD STILL WITH TARTANS. NEW ONES ARE BEING CREATED EVERY DAY."

St. Patrick's Day Parade in Greenwich on Sunday, March 20, and on Saturday, April 9, when it marches in the New York Tartan Day Parade. Although it is custom not to don another clan's tartan, the rules have eased, which is understandable, given the way this checked pattern has woven itself into popular consciousness. "Now it's just an overall celebration of all things Scottish," MacIntyre says.

Tartan, which is created by patterns established by specific thread counts bound horizontally (weft) and vertically (warp), has a present-day role as muse for high-profile fashion designers. The late Alexander McQueen, Marc Jacobs and Stella McCartney have turned to it for inspiration. Howie Nicholsby has created trendy kilts and tartan design for European and American celebrities with his 21st Century Kilts. There's even cargo kilts.

MacIntyre said he does not know the exact meaning behind his family's design, but he has had a close relation to the craft: His grandmother was a weaver back in Scot-

Of course, if you were around in Greenwich from the early 1920s to well into the past century, you would have seen plenty of clans, kilts and tartans with the annual Round Hill Highland Games each Fourth of July holiday. It was a tradition that began in 1923, when Charles Moore, who was of Scottish descent and who lived on Round Hill Road in Greenwich, offered the use of his grounds to his Scottish-born workers to celebrate their motherland. It grew bigger each year, until the property was sold and the event moved to different sites.

Clans themselves can have tartan variations that represent modern and ancient patterns, as well as those for certain pastimes, such as "Initially, it became a badge of wherever you came from. So clan tartans had no meanings except where they come from or who they were worn by," says Brian Wilton, director of the Scottish Tartans Authority and designer (he fashioned four of the tartans mentioned at the start). The idea that they have meaning is new, too. In the beginning, a weaver from a particular area might specialize in a design that would become affiliated with that region, but starting with the 1700s and 1800s, the idea of clans with distinct patterns, known as setts, and colors began to emerge. Some suspect the shift was brought on by a mix of Scottish pride (Highlands dress and the tartan had been banned by the English from about 1750 to 1780) and a desire by far-flung expats to surround themselves with objects from home.

"The beauty about tartans in this modern era is you can design the history of tomorrow in the tartan of today," Wilton says. For example, among the elements in the New York Tartan Day Parade design is six gray bands signifying the six traffic lanes of Sixth Avenue, the parade route. He said purists might be a bit abashed at that inclusion, but he said it's a matter of "making tartan relevant for the people who use it."

WHEN A PAINTING HAS A LIFE OF ITS OWN

By Joe Meyers

he idea of literal representation holds no interest for artist Lisa Cus-

When gallery patrons look at one of her surrealistic paintings and ask, "What are you trying to say?" she would prefer that viewers come up with their own interpretations.

Cuscuna has delighted in combining the real and the surreal in work like the canvas that shows an open doorway floating in the sky above a beach. (I think of that airborne, reflective monolith in "2001," but you might see Dali or Escher.)

"I ask people to look beyond a conventional way of seeing things — try to choose another point of view and see if that works for you," she says in her studio at Stamford's Loft Artists Association.

The pull between control and chaos in Cuscuna's work might be more acute than it is for other artists because she has juggled life as a successful businesswoman with her abstract art. The artist retired from her job as a producer of video installations for museums to refocus her energy.

"I did budgeting and design. I was at the top of my game, but I never saw my family," she says of creating huge video displays for places like the twin tower skyscraper in Kuala Lumpur. That was a $2.7 million video wall project that took three years to pull together. (She used the New York Philharmonic for the music.)

"Painting is an ever-changing new career for me," Cuscuna adds of her life now. "I am very much enthralled with the idea of the creative process and that it should be unfettered. The work should flow through the artist, taking on a spirit and youthfulness that you won't get if you push too hard. ... Zen and art go together for me."

Cuscuna was still pulling together work for a major show at the Stamford nonprofit — "The Fluid Palette," opening March 17 — when I visited her studio.

The surreal paintings began in a roundabout way for her.

"I was doing a lot of surreal photography and I took the work to a gallery that liked them, but they said, 'These are very nice. Can you paint them?' I said, 'Absolutely' without missing a beat and went right home and started to paint," she says with a smile.

A door suddenly opened into new territory for the artist, much like the portals she has included in her work.

Cuscuna has been delving deeply into the concept of "poured painting" in recent work. Instead of using a brush, an artist working with this technique pours paint onto a canvas and builds a new work layer by layer. The process of pouring and then being forced to wait for the next step has bolstered Cuscuna's belief in the union of art and zen and other practical aspects of life. During the required pauses to allow each layer of oil paint to dry, she is able to shift gears to her volunteer work as treasurer of the Loft Artists Association.

New York artist Paul Jenkins was the father of this style of art that played a major role in the classic late-1970s artworld drama, "An Unmarried Woman." He created the work done by the painter Alan Bates plays in the movie.

"It's a departure from the exact and the specific that excited my imagination," Cuscuna says of the technique, in which part of the "control" is taken away from the artist. "There are certain things that the paint does by itself - it curdles, there are striations and textural effects you have to work with.

"This is far more challenging than looking at something and replicating it. You have to be on your toes, ready for personal adjustments. ... The painting has a life of its own.

"You also do a lot of praying," she says, laughing.

A volunteer job inspires novelist Chris Belden

By Joe Meyers

eaching writing to maximum security prisoners was supposed to be a temporary gig for novelist Chris Belden, but six years later, he is still spending a day each week at the Garner Correctional Institution in Newtown.

"It has been a way to learn about people, learn about teaching and to see how people can grow," the author of the acclaimed 2015 novel "Shriver" says of the volunteer work that has become an essential part of his life.

Sentences

Summer 2015

"I haven't yet written about the experience in any form, but it has certainly influenced me — my life and how I see the characters in my work," Belden adds of his Thursday mornings with prison writers.

"When I tell people I do this, it's an immediate attention getter. They want to know what it's like. 'Are you scared?' People are pumped from all of the movies and TV shows they've seen about prisons."

Belden admits he was slightly anxious at first — "There was a fear of the unknown" — but he has never once experienced anything that has made him regret his commitment.

"Some of the guys in there are not necessarily friendly or outgoing, but that's rare. Overwhelmingly they are happy I'm there," he says.

Belden jokes that past experience trying to teach groggy college students at 8 a.m. classes makes him appreciate the enthusiasm of his prison writers all the more. "I know when someone doesn't want to be in a class, but my Garner students thank me regularly, sometimes profusely."

The proof of the value in what Belden does can be seen in "Sentences," the literary journal that he edits, collecting the best work of his students nostalgic tales of happy childhood moments, angry accounts of time lost in confinement, vivid memories of the joy to be found in one beautiful autumn day on the outside.

The Ridgefield novelist started at Garner to fulfill a third-year thesis project in the MFA program at Fairfield University. He had to find a second subject that was not connected to his creative writing submission. A thesis dealing with the teaching of writing was eligible, and when Belden saw that social justice work was a subcategory, he applied to be a volunteer at the Newtown facility. The writer became part of a long tradition of prison writing teachers that has included another Connecticut notable, the best-selling novelist, Wally Lamb. After Belden completed his Fairfield University assignment, he realized he did not want to give up his Thursdays in Newtown. Writing is a natural extension of the intensive reading done by many prisoners. In maximum security cells, there is little else the convicts can do to fill the seemingly endless "free" time.

"The guys are very interested in reading, and they write all kinds of crazy stuff based on that ... and science fiction. A lot of what could be called urban fiction — life on the streets, social justice. Fantasy serves a real purpose for them, too."

Belden says he has learned most of what he knows about prison life indirectly, because the men don't generally like to talk about their lives outside class.

"I'm interested to see how prison works and doesn't work, but a lot of it is still mysterious to me, even after six years. I hear stuff, but they generally don't talk about why they are there,'

he says of the crimes that caused his students to be imprisoned. "So I don't ask about that."

Like all writers, Belden's students want their work to find a connection with readers, so the literary journal "Sentences" is an important part of the class, along with readings where special guests are invited to hear the prisoners' stories and poems.

"Sentences" receives some funding from the Westport Writers Workshop, where Belden also teaches.

"To me it's super important when you're writing regularly to have readers. And the guys want their work to get out there — to have some kind of outlet for what they do. We all need that."

A Christmas memory

As you peered toward the staircase, you got a quick glimpse of a shadow downstairs in the living room, where a majestic Christmas tree stood. Could it be? Was he really there? ... You peeked your head around the corner, and to your astonishment and disappointment Santa was nowhere to be found, but under the tree, wrapping a present was your mother.

An after-prison story

He pulls up to his babymother's house and sees his son sitting on his bike in the front and talking to his cousins and uncles that are his age. He gets out of the car and smiles to himself as he reads his son's lips: "Is that my daddy?" He closes the car door and his heart softens as his son jumps off his bike and runs toward him and says, "What up, Dad?" "Everything, baby boy. Everything.'

What is lost in prison

One day I looked back and my youth was gone. What I have lost along the way has been scattered from prison cell to prison cell ... all over America, pieces of my soul I will never get back. A living death, when I look around my cell I see nothing but a

FitBit for feelings: Love in the age of technology

By Amanda Cuda

hen Michael Gabriel's marriage ended, the Greenwich resident was plagued with questions.

Was there something that he missed? What more could he have done? Did he change? Did his wife change? Was there a way they could have assessed and fixed the problems in the relationship before they spiraled out of control and the marriage ended?

"I was just trying to figure out what happened," says Gabriel, 55, a longtime media and technology executive who has worked for such companies as HBO, NBC and the National Basketball Association.

His quest led him to write "The Balanced Relationship Barometer," which applies business tactics to the task of sustaining loving and successful relationships. But Gabriel didn't want to stop there. He wanted to give people another tool that would allow them to take a close look at what they wanted from their relationship, and to track how well their goals were being fulfilled. It dawned on him that, if people can track their physical fitness and financial health using mobile apps on their smartphone or tablet, why couldn't they do the same with romantic relationships?

So he developed Relationship Barometer, an app that allows users to set relationship goals, then regularly check in on how well those goals are being met. "Basically, it's FitBit for relationships," Gabriel says.

Relationship Barometer is one of a number of apps that claim to help users assess and/or improve their love lives. Others include the Boyfriend Log, through which users can track their satisfaction with their relationships on a day-to-day basis; Love Maps, which encourages partners to improve their relationship by learning more about each other; and Fix a Fight, which helps resolve conflicts.

Like many pieces of technology, these apps can be helpful if used correctly, says Stamford-based dating coach Sandy Weiner. For instance, she's heard of apps that help long-distance couples stay in touch. She also likes the idea of an app such as Gabriel's that helps people think critically about what they want out of their relationship.

"Anything that helps people communicate with each other and tell their partner they love them is probably a good thing," says Weiner, who runs the site LastFirstDate.com.

To Gabriel, using technology as a relationship aid is a no-brainer, and something that's long overdue. "We've started to use technology to improve other parts of our lives," he says. "One of the most important aspects of our lives is the romantic relationship we have with someone, and we often just let that happen to us.'

The Relationship Barometer app provides users with a starter list of traits — such as "communicates well," "makes me feel important," "complains a lot" and "is sloppy" — and has them pick ones that are important to them (labeled as "Gotta Have" in the app), ones that are somewhat important ("Like to Have") and ones they wish their partner wouldn't display ("Gotta Not Have"). Users are then asked to assess how well their relationship fulfills each of their needs by giving them a ranking ranging from "Sunny" (need is being met perfectly) to "Tornado"

(need isn't being met at all). Users are then asked to provide updates (called "Check-ins" on the app) about how their needs are being met. For instance, if one of their "Gotta Haves" is partner hasn't called in days, the user would enter that information. Over time, the check-ins create an overall picture (or "forecast") of the relationship's strengths and weaknesses.

"It really keeps you in touch with the things in the relationship that give you pleasure, and keeps you from ignoring the things that bring you pain," Gabriel savs.

However, he and Weiner stressed that technology is just one tool in the utility kit of relationship management. Though it can play a role, it doesn't eliminate the need for other tools — such as simple, open, honest communication.

"(Apps) certainly don't replace face-to-face interaction and conversation," Weiner says. "You still need that."

with a flimsy hand — and at threatening vulnerability. Many experts would have chosen North's 3NT; it looks to me like a bid better suited South's four clubs was an artificial inquiry. North's four diamonds said his 3NT was based on a long, solid suit, not a fistful of high cards. Against six clubs, West led the jack of spades. Finding himself declarer, Ron Smith of Chicago took the ace and knew he could succeed if he located the ace of diamonds. If East had it, declarer could lead a low diamond from dummy. Then if East took the ace, declarer would have 12 tricks. If East played low, declarer could win, pitch dummy's king of diamonds on the king of spades, and ruff a heart in his hand for a 12th trick. But if West held the ace of diamonds, South had to lead the first diamond through him. (This maneuver is known as "Morton's Fork." Cardinal Morton, treasurer for King Henry VII, extracted funds from affluent nobles with this approach: If they lived well, they clearly had plenty of money; if they lived frugally, they had money saved.) Since West had bid, vulnerable, spectators watching on the Internet expected declarer to play him for the ace of diamonds. But Smith knew his customers. He led a trump to dummy at Trick Two, returned the deuce of diamonds and made the slam. As it turned out, his team would have lost the match had he failed.
